Using Router IP Address

With the rapid expansion of the number of homes and small businesses with broadband Internet service, more and more people are connecting multiple computers to the Internet through a single cable or DSL modem using a router or other gateway.

This explosion in Internet usage has also resulted in many Internet Service Providers (ISPs) issuing dynamic Internet Protocol (IP) addresses so that a limited number of addresses can be re-used when the computer they were assigned to is off or off-line. This dynamic assignment of addresses is often handled by a Dynamic Host Control Protocol (DHCP) server on one of the ISP's computers.

The effect of all of this is that at any given time your router may be assigned an IP address that differs from the one it had yesterday or even an hour ago. If you are trying to connect to your computer from another location you often need to know the IP address of your router in order to do so.

Enter Router IP Address.

Simply open the application and it will display the IP address of your router—essentially the IP address that web sites and other servers believe your computer is using (even though your computer has likely has its own address issued by the router itself).
